Early or late Planting.

Is it best to plant as early as possible or to defer this work as long as can be safely done? This lowing hint: is a question in which all farmers are interested, and to which each year they are practically obliged to reply. While there are many advocates for each of these extremes, I thing there is a 'golden mean' which will lead to much better results. Either of the extremes are open to grave objections, which do not lie aganst a time half way between. It is true, as the advocates of early planting claim, that if the seed is got into the ground very early, the work is done and out of the way of other things which then need attention. But the ob jections to this course are that the The recent centennial celebration ground and weather are so cold ear the first collision between the pat the ground or else is a long while riots of America and the tyrants of coming up; often falls a prey to Great Britain, and the approaching wire warms; the plants, if any apcelebration at Charlotte to come pear, are tender and grew very memorate the centennial of the slowly, while the weeds, which are first declaration of independence, more hardy, at once go in and would seem to suggest the propriety possess the land.
